

The Shade of Strategy

RICHARD RUMELT

JAN 28, 2026

Original BCG Perspectives circa 1969. Courtesy BCG
Archive

You are looking at the original operating system of modern strategy.

The Boston Consulting Group was the first advisory firm fully specialized in strategy. Founded in 1963 by Bruce Henderson, it soon began sending essays called Perspectives to executives around the world.

Thanks for reading The Rumelt Perspectives!
Subscribe for free to receive new posts and
support my work.

✓ Subscribed

These were not long reports or “press releases.” Henderson’s Perspectives arrived on executives’ desks printed on textured, heavy paper in this specific shade of dusty green. There were no photographs. There was only a title, a premise, and an argument.

I remember them clearly. Those green pamphlets were brief but dense with insight. They respected your intelligence, not your patience. The quality and originality of the thinking were the sales pitch.

When I first met Henderson in late 1966, he was excitedly exploring the implications of what he named The Experience Curve. He told me:

“The key issue is how some firms outperform their competitors and maintain their lead. The standard explanation is economies of scale, but that cannot explain how leaders stay ahead. The experience curve explains it.”

His Perspectives on the experience curve shaped thinking about strategy for a decade, as did the subsequent Perspectives on the product portfolio.

Henderson promoted the idea that effective strategy grows out of comprehending the forces at work in a situation—out of a clear diagnosis. Today, the modern business world has largely forgotten this.

Strategy is not planning. It is not simply setting goals.

A “Perspective” is different. A Perspective is a distinct way of seeing a challenge. It triggers the realization that the problem you thought you had is not the problem you actually have.

I am renaming this publication The Rumelt Perspectives to align my work with that standard.

You will notice the design of this site has changed. The “Rusty Green” you see on the buttons and links is not a decoration; it is a citation. It is a nod to that paper stock from 1967.

It is a reminder to me, and a promise to you, that we are not here to add to the noise. We are here to parse gnarly situations and define a way forward.

Welcome to The Rumelt Perspectives.

Thanks for reading The Rumelt Perspectives!

Subscribe for free to receive new posts and
support my work.

✓ Subscribed